Abstract

This research discusses in-depth strategies for handling crimes of severe abuse that occur in the context of archery cases among the community by adopting a holistic perspective from criminology and criminal law. The aim is to analyze and compare these two different points of view, as well as explore the possibility of collaboration between them, resulting in a more practical approach to dealing with this problem. The method used in this research is library research, where data collection is carried out by reviewing various literature, books and reports that are relevant to the topic being discussed. The findings obtained indicate that integration between a criminological approach which focuses on aspects of prevention and rehabilitation with firm law enforcement from a criminal law perspective is critical to creating a comprehensive solution. Therefore, this study recommends the development of collaborative programs involving various stakeholders, including government, social institutions, and communities, to develop treatment strategies that are more effective in preventing severe abuse in society as a whole.

I. Introduction

Strategies for handling crimes of severe abuse in cases of archery among the community reflect significant differences between criminological and criminal law perspectives (Attaqwa et al., 2024). From a criminological perspective, the main focus lies in analyzing causes, prevention, and rehabilitation (Vasiloi, 2023). This approach seeks to understand the social, psychological and cultural background that can trigger violent behaviour (J. Wang, 2023). Meanwhile, the criminal law perspective places greater emphasis on normative law enforcement and appropriate sanctions for criminals (Sunaryo et al., 2022). Handling carried out through legal channels aims to provide a deterrent effect and ensure justice for victims (Novika, 2020). This difference is critical to understand in order to formulate a more effective and comprehensive treatment strategy (Safonova & Zhelonkina, 2022).

In the existing literature review, there are a number of theories that attempt to explain the phenomenon of crime and various strategies that can be used to deal with it (Steinmetz, 2021). However, many of these theories do not seem to be able to provide adequate and practical solutions to the problem of severe abuse, especially in the context of archery that occurs in society (Andrianov, 2021). For example, although social learning theory shows how aggressive behaviour can be transmitted from one individual to another through the process of social interaction, there needs to be an explicit integration between this theory and the current legal approach (Henson et al., 2023). This shows that there is a significant gap in the literature that needs to be filled with more in-depth, comprehensive, and interdisciplinary research (Sisavanh, 2023). Therefore, it is essential to conduct research that examines the relationship and interaction between criminological approaches and criminal law in the context of severe abuse (Alifia et al. et al., 2023). With a better understanding of this relationship, it is hoped that solutions can be found more effectively and sustainably to address this complex crime issue (Alifia et al. et al., 2023).

This research aims to identify and analyze the differences and similarities that exist between the two perspectives in dealing with crimes of severe abuse that occur in the context of archery in the community (Alviyan, 2020). Apart from that, this research also aims to explore various ways that can be done to collaborate these two approaches so that they can produce more effective and impactful treatment strategies (Tabin, 2023). By uncovering and exploring these differences and similarities, it is hoped that this research can provide valuable new insights for policymakers, practitioners in the field of law, and also social professionals (Këllezi et al., 2023). Thus, the results of this research will not only enrich the theoretical understanding of this issue but will also provide practical guidance that can be applied in natural contexts to increase the effectiveness of handling severe abuse crimes in society (Alviyan, 2020).

The argument or hypothesis underlying this research is the importance of integrating a criminological perspective with criminal law in efforts to deal with the increasing number of severe abuse crimes (Attaqwa et al., 2024). Based on the facts that have been presented and discussed comprehensively, there is a need to formulate a strategy which not only focuses on reactive legal aspects but also considers various social factors that contribute to violent behaviour in society (Alviyan, 2020). With clear and directed research objectives, it is hoped that the results of this research can provide a real contribution and be significant in efforts to handle crimes of severe abuse in society (Alifia et al. et al., 2023). In addition, this research can help create a safer and more conducive environment where every individual feels protected and has the right to receive justice (Werner et al., 2021). Thus, it is hoped that integrating these two perspectives will create a more holistic and sustainable solution to the issue of violence in society.

2. Research Method

This research focuses on strategies for handling crimes of severe abuse in archery cases among the community, with a criminology and criminal law perspective. The type of research used is library research, which relies on primary data from relevant literature regarding the differences in approaches to the two perspectives, as well as secondary data which includes books, journals and other scientific research. The sources of information in this research involve various theories, including Social Learning Theory by Albert Bandura (1977), Anomie Theory by Émile Durkheim (1897), Social Control Theory by Travis Hirschi (1969), Strain Theory by Robert K. Merton (1938), and Cesare Beccaria's Theory of Penalty (1764), which together provide a comprehensive understanding of capital abuse. The research process is carried out by reading literature, including relevant books, papers, journals, and reports. For data analysis, content analysis techniques are used to identify patterns, relationships and essential information, with the hope that the results of this analysis can provide new insights into developing strategies for handling crime in society.

3. Results and Discussion

Literature review regarding strategies for handling crimes of severe abuse in archery cases among the community from a criminological perspective.

The studies conducted clearly show that the criminological approach focuses on a deep understanding of the causes of criminal behaviour, prevention of criminal acts, and rehabilitation of the perpetrators involved (Wikstro die m & Kroneberg, 2021). In this context, various factors that influence individual behaviour, such as social background, level of education, and norms that apply in the community, are the main concerns and essential aspects that must be considered in formulating effective prevention strategies (Shamah-Levy et al., 2022). In addition, many studies have been conducted. Carried out shows that interventions that involve active participation from the community can significantly reduce the level of violence that occurs because this approach not only strengthens social solidarity but also supports training and education for the community (Glass et al., 2019). Thus, involving the community in the process of dealing with the problem of violence will create an environment that is safer and more responsive to the needs and challenges faced, thereby reducing the possibility of crime occurring in the future (Nubani et al., 2023).

From a criminological perspective, handling cases of severe abuse crimes not only requires firm and consistent law enforcement but also requires a holistic approach that includes in-depth education and rehabilitation aspects (Travaini et al., 2020). By understanding the various factors that influence aggressive behaviour in individuals, more comprehensive strategies can be designed to address this problem fundamentally and thoroughly (Oliveira Neto, 2023). Research that has been conducted shows that programs that focus on prevention, such as dialogue between groups that facilitate communication and understanding, as well as skill development for critical social issues, can significantly help reduce tensions that have the potential to trigger acts of violence (micro-nations & Siboe Wanjala, 2022). In this way, a more proactive and community-based approach can be created, thereby not only addressing the impact of abuse but also reducing the possibility of violence in the future through increasing social interaction and developing individual abilities in managing conflict (Kusuma & Sembiring, 2022).

The inability to integrate a comprehensive and systematic criminological approach in handling severe crimes often results in the development and implementation of strategies that are ineffective and not in accordance with real needs in the field (Levy et al., 2022). In many cases that have been studied, repressive actions Mere measures, such as arrests and harsh sentences, are not enough to address the root causes of these crimes (J. Wang, 2023). This shows that these approaches are often reactive and need help to provide sustainable solutions (Restar et al., 2023). The reality faced in the field clearly shows that without solid support from local communities and a deep understanding of the social and cultural context in which crime occurs, violence prevention efforts are likely to fail (Gram et al., 2023). Therefore, it is essential to develop more inclusive and community-based strategies where the active involvement of all stakeholders can create a safe and supportive environment (S. Ravichandran, 2024). With this more holistic approach, it is hoped that there will be a significant reduction in levels of violence and abuse, as well as an increase in the overall wellbeing of society.

Literature review regarding strategies for handling severe abuse crimes from a criminal law perspective

This study carefully reveals that criminal law is not just a norm (Gear et al., 2021) but also provides a clear and structured framework for law enforcement and the imposition of appropriate sanctions against perpetrators of crimes (Fernandes et al. Hasibuan, 2023). In this context, various laws and regulations have been carefully formulated to respond to cases of severe abuse, with the main aim of protecting the rights and welfare of victims and providing a significant deterrent effect to the perpetrators (Ravshanovich, 2022). Furthermore, this research shows that consistent and transparent law enforcement is critical in building and maintaining public trust in the existing justice system so that the public feels protected and actively participates in supporting the fair application of the law (Hidayat et al., 2023).

From a criminal law perspective, handling cases of severe abuse is greatly influenced by a series of procedures that must be followed carefully by authorized law enforcement officials (Komarynska & Polian, 2023). This process includes several essential steps, starting from an effective investigation, where an investigation is carried out thoroughly and in-depth, to the collection of robust and reliable evidence to support the case (Esakov, 2023). Furthermore, this process also includes prosecuting the perpetrator in court, where justice must be upheld through a fair and transparent justice system (Lubis et al., 2023). Existing research shows clearly that clarity in the law and accuracy in imposing sanctions play an essential role in efforts to prevent the recurrence of similar crimes in the future (Buckenmaier et al., 2021). However, it should be noted that the effectiveness of the law Crime is often hampered by a number of disturbing factors, such as corruption within the system, limited resources possessed by law enforcement officials, and a lack of adequate training for those tasked with law enforcement, all of which can have a negative impact on the ideal implementation of the law (Chalfin & McCrary, 2017).

Although criminal law has provided a clear and detailed framework for handling crimes of severe maltreatment, in practice, its implementation often does not go according to the expectations and plans that have been set (Attaqwa et al., 2024). There is a striking mismatch between the applicable law and the reality on the ground, creating various significant challenges in the law enforcement process itself (Tinjauan et al., 2023). This situation results in many cases of severe abuse that should be handled seriously, not being handled effectively, which in turn gives rise to deep frustration among victims and the wider community (Alifia et al. et al., 2023). This dissatisfaction not only affects public trust in the legal system but also shows the need for comprehensive evaluation and reform in law enforcement approaches so that they can be more responsive to the needs and expectations of society (Gunawan, 2014).

Literature review regarding collaborative strategies for handling crimes of severe abuse in archery cases among the community, criminology and criminal law perspectives

This study clearly shows that close and synergistic collaboration between various stakeholders, which includes the government, non-governmental organizations, and society as a whole, is essential in creating and developing more effective handling strategies in dealing with issues. Crimes of severe abuse (Santiago & Smith, 2019). By sharing relevant information and available resources, these parties can work together to formulate more comprehensive and integrated policies in an effort to overcome the crime problem (Laird et al., 2020). This collaboration not only allows for more holistic treatment but also increases the effectiveness and efficiency of each step taken so that it can produce more targeted solutions (Huzzard, 2021). Apart from that, active involvement from all parties can also strengthen the network support and facilitate the exchange of valuable knowledge, which in turn will help create a safer and better environment for all members of society (Tyagi, 2019).

Well-established collaboration between various stakeholders allows for more integrated and comprehensive treatment, which combines a preventative approach with effective law enforcement (H. Wang et al., 2022). Existing research shows clearly that programs that involve cross-sector collaboration, including training aimed at law enforcement officers as well as counselling provided to the community, can significantly increase the effectiveness of the handling strategies implemented (Hamilton et al., 2023). By implementing a coordinated and collaborative approach, the risk of abuse can be reduced. Minimized better so that, in the end, the public will feel safer and more protected (Halford & Smith, 2022). This not only has a positive impact on the public's perception of security but can also build greater trust in the existing justice system and law enforcement (Zgierska et al., 2021). Thus, this collaboration is critical in creating a safe and conducive environment for all members of society (Kamin et al., 2022).

Although collaboration between various stakeholders has enormous potential to increase the effectiveness of handling cases of severe abuse, significant challenges remain and must be addressed (Potthoff et al., 2023). Some of these challenges include communication problems that often arise between agencies, which can hamper the flow of information and necessary coordination, as well as limited resources, which often become obstacles in implementing planned programs (Sudra et al., 2023). This reality clearly shows that effective collaboration, strong commitment, and consistent support from all parties involved, including the government, non-governmental organizations, and local communities, must be achieved (Van Dongen et al., 2020). Apart from that, it is also essential to have a clear and structured evaluation mechanism in order to ensure that the strategy implemented is running well and is appropriate with predetermined goals (Henderson et al., 2019). In this way, continuous evaluation will help identify areas that need improvement, as well as provide helpful feedback for the development of better policies in the future (Henderson et al., 2019).

Strategies for handling crimes of severe abuse that occur in the context of archery among the community need to be analyzed and viewed from two different but complementary perspectives, namely criminology and criminal law (Karystianis et al., 2024). From a criminological perspective, the main focus lies in understanding in depth the causes underlying acts of abuse as well as the development of practical prevention efforts to avoid the recurrence of similar incidents in the future (Reeves et al., 2023). Meanwhile, the criminal law perspective emphasizes consistent law enforcement and strict sanctions against perpetrators of crimes in order to provide a deterrent effect and ensure that criminal acts do not go unpunished without consequences (Rockowitz et al., 2024). This research also clearly highlights the importance of close collaboration between these two approaches because the integration of criminological understanding and the application of criminal law can create more comprehensive, practical and sustainable treatment strategies for overcoming the problem of severe abuse. Thus, the synergy between these two scientific disciplines is expected to produce better solutions and have a positive impact on society (Russell & Higgins, 2023).

In the existing literature, there are striking similarities with previous studies, which show that handling crime in general requires a multidimensional approach involving various aspects and scientific disciplines (Hinton et al., 2021). However, this research adds explicitly a new dimension that significantly emphasizes the importance of close collaboration between the fields of criminology and criminal law as a strategy to increase the effectiveness of various efforts to deal with crimes committed (Ball et al., 2024). Thus, this research places itself in a more relevant and innovative position, especially considering the large amount of research others that only focus on one perspective, so they often do not touch and pay attention to broader and more complex problems (van Steden, 2023). The approach proposed in this research aims to fill existing gaps in the literature and offer a more comprehensive solution to crime problems, so it is hoped that it can make a meaningful contribution to the development of theory and practice in handling crime in society (Yan et al., 2022).

This research implies that with good collaboration, strategies for handling severe crimes will be effective, which in turn will have a negative impact on community safety (Ball et al., 2024). Therefore, these findings provide an essential contribution to the development of crime-handling policies. The results of this research emphasize the need for reform in handling serious crimes of abuse, which does not only rely on law enforcement but also involves prevention and rehabilitation (Cikara et al., 2021). This implication is significant for policymakers and law enforcement officials in formulating more responsive policies to the needs of society, which can address the root causes of violence (Ball et al., 2024). Approaches that focus too much on law enforcement often fail to address the underlying problems that cause violence (Christensen et al., 2019). Social factors and psychological factors that contribute to severe abuse need to be recognized and treated seriously. Therefore, the results of this research reflect the urgent need for a more integrated and holistic approach to dealing with crime (Jawab et al., 2024).

This research strongly recommends the development of collaborative programs that involve various stakeholders, including government, non-governmental organizations, and local communities (Ellyin et al., 2021). This program should include comprehensive public education about the issue of violence and various ways to prevent it so that society has a better understanding of this problem (Lund et al., 2022). In addition, systematic and ongoing training for law enforcement officers is also essential to ensure that they have the skills and knowledge necessary to handle cases of abuse more effectively (Levy et al., 2022). This program also needs to include focused rehabilitation initiatives for criminals to give them the opportunity to change and reduce the possibility of repeat violent acts in the future (Richardson et al., 2023). Implementing these recommendations is hoped to create a safer and more conducive environment, as well as prevent the occurrence of severe crimes in society more effectively. Thus, this collaborative effort will not only have a positive impact on the individuals involved but also on overall social health.

Research findings

Aspect	Criminological Perspective	Criminal Law Perspective	Collaboration Between the Two
Focus	Analysis of causes, prevention. Rehabilitation	Law enforcement. Strict sanctions	A holistic approach that includes prevention and law enforcement
Approach	Education and social intervention	Legal process and application of sanctions	Prevention programs involving the law
Objective	Reducing crime rates through social understanding	Ensure justice and order	Creating a safe environment through cooperation
Method	Social research, surveys and data analysis	Legal proceedings, courts, and enforcement	Integration of research methods to understand the case thoroughly

Results	Decreased violent behavior	Increasing awareness society	legal in handling of violence	More effective and responsive

4. Conclusion

Approaches to criminology and criminal law that are implemented separately, without adequate integration, not only have the potential to reduce the effectiveness of various strategies designed to deal with crimes of severe abuse in society but can also worsen the situation of violence that already exists in that society. By ignoring and not taking advantage of the collaboration that should exist between these two perspectives, efforts made to prevent crime and law enforcement against violations that have already occurred become out of sync and ineffective, ultimately increasing the risk of further abuse occurring, which can have negative impacts. Broader for individuals and the community as a whole.

This research makes a significant contribution to understanding the complex interaction between criminological theory and criminal law, which, in many cases, are often considered separate and unrelated to each other. Practically, the results of this research can be used as a solid basis for policymakers to formulate more holistic and collaborative policies in handling various forms of crime by integrating in a balanced manner various aspects, including prevention, rehabilitation, and law enforcement. Thus, this research creates an approach that is more comprehensive and effective in dealing with crime problems in society.

Although this research provides essential and valuable insights, its limitations lie in its focus, which only includes cases of archery and does not involve other forms of abuse that may also be relevant to the research. This clearly opens up opportunities for further research to explore broader dynamics in the handling of crimes of abuse, taking into account more complex and diverse contexts. Further research can deepen the analysis carried out by taking into account other variables that may be influential, such as cultural differences, social norms, or different social contexts so that it can further enrich our understanding of the handling of crime in society in a more comprehensive and detailed manner.
